Measuring workplace mental health can not be done alone. It requires many organisations joining together to ensure consistent results.

Some of the key findings to date

- Recognition of pressure at work was one of the lowest scoring areas amongst employees
- Employers are consistently under-recognising the amount of pressure their employees are feeling
- Both employers and employees recognise that employees don't feel confident enough to learn from mistakes for personal growth
- Employees believe their workplace is committed to supporting their mental wellbeing whilst the employer feels they need to do more
- The challenge is that even though there is a perceived openness to talking about mental health that there is a need for a call to action to put the listening into action
